FAQ:

1. Do I have to speak Japanese? No. Many students go without any Japanese ability. The program includes a full course of Japanese language studies. It is however advisable to work on your Japanese prior to arrival.
2. Are there courses in English? Yes. Nagoya University is a large school and offers many courses in English. For a listing see: <http://www.ecis.nagoya-u.ac.jp/en/nupace/academic/course/index.html>
3. Do I have to have a law background? Yes and no. The exchange agreement is with the Undergraduate School of Law and requires that “applicants have a strong academic record demonstrating interests in political science or law, and present a plan to pursue those interests within the Graduate School and School of Law at Nagoya University.” As long as you can demonstrate this record you are eligible. For example, an art student who has taken a law course and can demonstrate an interest (such as the policy governing censorship of art) would be eligible. You will also be expected to take one course at the school of law.
4. Isn't Japan expensive? Yes and no. Yes, Japan can be expensive like the US. However, Nagoya university is a national university and the costs are subsidized by the government. Student life at the university is quite inexpensive. Most students will spend less money in Japan than at GMC. For example, housing on campus costs about $200 per month. The dining halls are also subsidized so students can plan to spend about $300 per month for food.
5. How many students can go? Around 2 students per semester from GMC. This could be a combination of students going for the year and students staying for only one semester.
6. When will I know the results of my application? GMC will review all applications and conduct individual interviews. By mid-March we will announce our ranking of students. Nagoya University however makes the final decision and will announce the results according to their schedule on their website.
